Understanding Lying and Defiance

It drives parents crazy, but still children lie. Lying and defiance often can go hand in hand. Not only are these traits common to all children, but foster children and adoptive children seem to turn to these quicker than most and hang on to the naughty traits longer than parents would like.

There are four stages of lying. If you have a child who has a problem lying, see if you can recognize where your child is at:

- 1. The behavior didn't happen.
- 2. The behavior happened, but he or she (someone else) did it.
- 3. I did it, but they/someone else made me do it.
- 4. The behavior happened and I did it.

Progress is defined as moving to the next stage - not a complete lack of lying.

Treatment

- Lying is a deficit in constancy knowing that the nurturing part of the caregiver still exists even when the caregiver is angry is not the same as feeling that the nurturing still exists and is still available to you.
- The lying is often unintentional, unplanned and impulsive in response to the underlying fear that the caregiver won't continue to love them if told the truth.
- Parents need to work on building trust and repeated activities that focus on "I love you even when..."
- Don't ask questions, instead make statements and focus on the end result of personal responsibility not if they admit what they did.
- Later when everyone is calm, remind the child that he or she is safe and nothing can make them unlovable then follow with a brief statement such as, "You can always tell me the truth."

Treating Defiance

- Avoid power struggles
- Offer choices
- Be mindful of your own responses to the defiance
- Be aware of and attuned to what triggers the child may be experiencing
- Be aware of and attuned to the age that this behavior would typically be seen
- Set and follow through with reasonable limits on a consistent basis
- Teach the life lesson later when child is calm
